

The System 2009

The Dean of public policy pundits, David Broder of the Washington Post, and 40 other veterans of the last national effort at health policy reform, will gather for a weekend in Minnesota to design an entirely new approach to the challenge of national health policy reform. Among those attending are the key health policy advisors to both President Clinton and President Bush, key Congressional staff, national journalists, public opinion and political experts.

Conference Goal

Comprehensive health care reform is at the top of the list of domestic priorities in the Presidential campaign of 2008. Using short presentations and facilitated discussions, the experts who participated in the last major health reform effort in 1993-1994 will evaluate the barriers and challenges to passing national health reform and design new processes or suggest new approaches to enhance the chances for success in the future. A small audience of invited guests will listen to the dialogue and participate in developing approaches for reform.
